Fed Cuts Rates by Quarter Point

Chair Powell says he has no intention of leaving before the end of his term

By Nick Timiraos

The Federal Reserve approved a quarter-point interest rate cut Thursday, but signaled a little more uncertainty over how quickly it would continue lowering rates, as it seeks to prevent large rate increases of the prior 2½ years from unnecessarily slowing the economy.

At a news conference after the meeting, Chair Jerome Powell said the election wouldn't have any effect on the Fed's immediate policy decisions. He also reaffirmed his intention to stay at the Fed until his four-year term as chair expires in May 2026; he said he wouldn't step down if President-elect Donald Trump asked him to resign.

Asked if he thought a president could remove him or other senior personnel from their positions before their terms end, Powell repeated his longstanding view with an uncharacteristically terse answer: "Not permitted under the law."

Separately, advisers to Trump said the incoming president wouldn't seek to make a change at the top of the Fed.

Thursday's rate decision followed an initial cut of a half-point in September and will bring the benchmark federal-funds rate to a range between 4.5% and 4.75%. All 12 Fed voters backed the cut.

Officials have said those moves are warranted because

- ◆ Powell says he wouldn't resign if asked by Trump... A2
- ◆ Bank of England cuts its key rate ahead of Fed... A16

Giddy Investors Place Bets On Trump Boom

Epic postelection Wall Street rally augurs big, lucrative gains, analysts say
